Where is the gap?

Navigating multistakeholder Internet governance is inherently complex, with many overlapping conversations and responsible entities.

Many governments are ill-equipped to follow, contribute and seek advice on Internet governance issues to solve domestic, regional and international policy challenges.

An open, free, secure and interoperable Internet requires governments to trust the multistakeholder approach.

What are we developing?

A web platform, 'speaking government', that links governments to a range of educational and advisory resources, to assist them better navigate and participate in multistakeholder Internet governance, and improve the strength of connection across the community to solve policy challenges.
